Concept

Actually it is quite simple: As human beings we know that we are capable of doing things we would rather forget, because envisioning them exceeds all the bounds of imaginable and understandable – we can't bear it, that we made something happen like that.

We rather idealize ourselves being people involved in culture and arts than consider the possibility of being denunciators, fellow travelers, well-behaved collaborators and contributors to a homicidal industry and bureaucracy. The fact that there will always exist people who make a different choice and decide to join resistance or always have been somewhere known for its active resistance, gives us an unpleasant feeling.

Actually understanding it isn't simple at all. There are at least three – I would like to call them existential – desiderata in this context: Never forget, never let it happen again and never stop trying to understand, how it could happen at all.

People, who e.g. have just started a search of memory, share these three needs together with those, who survived the Nazi regime (and those, who didn't).

We also know: If we stop remembering our precedents will be irrevocably dead. In this respect the Nazis and their supporters should not succeed.

Therefore it was extraordinarily important to involve as many people as possible right from the beginning. Involve them through workshops, as speakers of testimonial texts for the audio-exhibition in the container or as project partners, who might reach a large audience through their activities and events.

Approaching the topic "Remembering resistance fighters, victims and survivors of the Nazi-Regime" it was important to use different media. It is the media that defines the form and therefore the content as well.

Some examples:

- An audio-exhibition that invites the audience into a container, to search, touch and listen.
- A star-shaped wall-object working with text-layers, that can be written on or drawn at by the public.
- Radiobroadcasts
- Workshops
- Photography (siehe „Maria Stallectew 11/9 1931“, Jaeger)
- Video (siehe Frank Hagen, Tinzl/Flunger)
- Skulptural (siehe z.B. Erinnerungskörper und Sternobjekt)
- Intervention in the agora (siehe z.B. zenklo TM)

Answering the question, which acts/memories should be particularly remembered in this project: People should be memorized the most, that weren't given much room concerning remembrance and partly even have been sealed as perpetrators in Austria – individuals in resistance. I wanted to increase the visibility of three different groups: organized and unorganized resistance of Carinthian Slovenians, resistance of Jewish people in the Balkans, queer people, who can be called part of resistance just for choosing their way of living and life.

Although this decision has been made, the question, which testimonials to choose, hasn't been completely answered yet. It would be helpful to deepen the studies of further categories. As I refuse categories adamantly, I decided to be as frugal as possible with categories.

There is nothing like „the“ history. History is always fragmental and dependent on what I look for, what I can find, what I already know and what I believe in. History is something in constant motion. The audio-exhibition within the container and its creation reflects this thought.

Visitors of the exhibition can only listen to the audio-files, if they are willing to look for them by touching and investigating the inner wall. There are several invisible buttons, located beneath a membrane, lining the inner surface of the container-wall, that have to be pressed to replay the audio-file.

To some extent the stories told within the 30 audio-files complement one another in substance. Visitors won't have a clue, what they will find. Containing 30 contributions the container or exhibition is in all but name overloaded. Each visitor has to decide for herself, how many audio-files she wants to listen to and it might be that some of the switches will not be found at all.

The surface of the freestanding, star-shaped wall, the second part of the installation, is working with three layers of text. I will apply the first layer. The next layer will be applied by pupils during a workshop and the third layer visitors of the exhibition and others will apply. As the first layer consists of hidden words, written with lemon-ink that shall be made visible for its viewers through the ambivalent medium of fire – standing for destruction and renewal at the same time – it plays with the idea of some invisible, secret, forgotten and dangerous knowledge.

The container, but also the concept of the star-shaped wall reflects the tension of invisibility / inaudibility in relation to its opposite, visibility / audibility. There is also the idea of a skin, a membrane that has a possibility to hide things lying beneath it. It is about vulnerability and how we handle this vulnerability. The membrane embodies a medium, a mediator of knowledge and reminds us of our existence, knowledge, we carry around and a lore that really gets us; gets close to our bones. A kind of wisdom or knowledge, we can try to bring out from beneath.

Visibility and invisibility in this context seem to confront us with the question: Who and what kind of content shall be memorized or be excluded from our memory-process, and how and in what way?

Another main focus lies on the examination of questions like: What does the NS-past mean for today? What are we trying to understand? And where are we now – what happens now?

That's the reason why there are contributions to the audio-exhibition that refer to current matters.

To come to an end, let me choose some final keywords: review this day and age!
